Sir Edwin Arnold is going to America on an One of the old legacies of the corrupt days of Septemberthe English Government is disappearing. When George I, was King nearly all the membors of Parliament expected to have valuable offices or sinecures conferred apon them, and few were disappointed. Some got only one, some got five or six. A little earlier in history the custom was to reward obsequious followers or the children of kings' mistresses with perpetual pensions. Many of them have been paid down to our own day. To one of these it has been my lot to call the attention of the House of Commons on several occasions. The Dukes of St. Albans are descended from Nell Gwynne. Charles II. not only bestowed a title upon Nell's son, but gave him the office of Master of the Hawks, with a salary of about £2000 a year. There was a provision for buying bawks, supplyments. Since Parliament rose last week arrangements have been made with the Duke of St. Allaus by which he is to receive an annuity of £2000 a year for ten years, and then all pay-
